Never before had our heroine felt the dread sense of coming danger so strongly as she did that night It weighed upon her, yet with her natural heroism she cast, it off. A cool brain and a mind full of expedients will, she said to herself, yet save me. But she was wrong. There are moments when the utmost prescience of man fails. Nature, at such times, takes upon herself the kind office of a watchful mother, and warns us of the coming danger. This warning came to the brave girl as she lay beneath the roof-tree of that arch-traitor and bad man, Milam, but she disregarded it. Had she yielded to this feeling, indescribable and inexplicable as it is, she might have been saved. She should have started for Nashville that very night, even though she walked every step of the way; instead of which she lingered, calling to her aid her own courageous nature to combat the kind promptings whispered by her-nore watchful soul, for these warnings of coming evil have their origin there. The next morning our heroine met Milam. He had not returned home until late at night, but had evidently been duly warned of her arrival. After some conversation, he said: You know Captain Blackman, I believe? I do. What of...
