The operator passes the blade, a, behind and below the epiglottis, and draws the valve slightly forwards and upwards;he then raises his finger from the spring, S, when the blade, b, advances to a, and the epiglottis is held gently between them. The blades, a and b, are a quarter of an inch broad, slightly convex from side to side (the convexity being directed forwards), and covered with india-rubber. would specially call the attention of inventive Chap. V. laryngoscopists to this subject, as I believe that a thoroughly effective instrument for drawing forward the epiglottis would be, without exception, the most useful addition to the art of laryngoscopy. In my pincette the anterior blade curves round, so that it can be passed behind and under the epiglottis, whilst the posterior blade, which alone moves, opens to the extent of almost half an. inch, and lies flat on the tube which contains the wire by which it is moved. The instrument is kept open by the pressure of the index finger on a spring in the handle, and when the anterior blade has been passed under the epiglottis, and has drawn it slightly upwards and forwards, the operator removes his finger from the spring, and the blades close and hold the valve in the desired position. The blades are broad, flat, and covered with india-rubber. Section VII.--The Self-holder or Fixateur. In applying remedies to, or...
